The Micorsoft settlement is not thorough enough, in my opinion, to keep MS from doing what they are doing to competitors now. It will simply take them a few more days to push out other Operating Systems or software browsers from the market by controlling how the core OS deals with 3rd party software. They need to be made accountable for their lack of support to other vendors who can not sell their products because MS has not made it a priority to help other companies work on a level playing field. By allowing 3rd party vendors to flounder, they can keep their own products in the consumer's homes.
